Placing implicit confidence in his friend, Morakas did not ask for his money when Lindsey went out seeking pleasure. Days passed, and Morakas learned that Lindsey made daily trips to the race course.

Trustful and unsuspicious. Morakas waited until the mythical restaurant proprietor should recover from his ill and three weeks passed. Then Lindsey said he learned that the restaurant proprietor was in Washington, and suggested coming to this city in search of the man.

"Borrows" Watch and $45. Morakas and Lindsey arrived here yesterday morning, and the young Greek gave his gold watch into the keeping of his friend while on the train for fear of pickpockets. Lindsey warned him free quently of thieves. The head waiter fergot to return the watch when they arrived at the Union Station, and also borrowed $45 from Morakas "for a few hours."

From the station the men went to the New Willard Hotel, where Morakas was left waiting in Peacock alley while Lindsey went in search of the restaurant proprietor. The men had left their baggage at the station, but Morakas did no grow suspicious of anything wrong uni three hours passed without the appearance of Lindsey.

Morakas went to Union Station and learned some one had claimed the bag-gage. The knowledge of his friend's deceit came to him like a blow, and h was stunned by the realization that he had been duped by the man he supposed to be his best friend. For hours he wandered about the city. He had nothing in his pockets but $11, the remnants of years ing at 5 o'clock from Fourteenth and of saving in his native land and months Park streets.
